Research is inclusion.

The very nature of scientific enquiry is an act of opening oneself to different sorts of experiences, conceptual approaches, views of the world i.e., Weltanschauungen.

Research is inclusion and the quest for variety, possibly to be included within a new, larger conceptual framework, or simply to be explored to highlight the inconsistencies of our knowledge.

Research is also a highly social activity: research communities, ever more international and interdisciplinary, are the engines of knowledge. Speaking of inclusion in a number of different socioeconomic, juridical and political contexts thus means applying research to its mirror images in wider human phenomena.

Here you can find many examples of theoretical and methodological attitudes to the study of inclusion, participation and discrimination. As always, we hope you may discover something intriguing in the research projects we carry out here at Luiss.
